I have been active in the computing field since before the beginning of the PC era. I have seen Microsoft reach too far into the cookie jar on numerous occasions only to be tapped on the wrist when someone had the courage or the legal support to challenge them.

Should you not institute severe penalties on them and force them to completely restructure the way they do business, it would be a grave disservice to the state of computing and to your office.

My opinion only,
David Stoddard.
